*Arts and cultural ecology consists of relationships among organizations, people, and places. Organizations nurture artistic expression and produce, present, support, and preserve arts and cultural content. People – (artists), cultural workers, managers, participants, and contributors – bring talent, energy, and resources to the cultural ecology and make important decisions that affect its evolution. Places – neighborhoods, towns, cities, regions, and states – are the sites for arts and cultural creation, innovation, production, presentation, and participation. Place-based political and civic leaders craft and implement the policies that nurture arts and cultural organizations even though the results may serve people and organizations farther afield. Arts and cultural nonprofits are a subsystem of an arts ecology. (California Arts Ecology 2011)
